Many believe that small businesses can be a key pillar of economic recovery and growth. However, COVID-19 has hit small businesses particularly hard.

In this context, the U.S. Senate Committee on Small Business and Entrepreneurship held a hearing on "Small Business Administration (SBA)" to discuss the impact of the pandemic on small businesses and the measures taken to support them. The committee asked Mr. Mark Vlahos, a representative from the SBA, to provide an update on the status of the Paycheck Protection Program (PPP), which has been crucial in providing financial relief to small businesses.

The committee also sought to understand the challenges faced by small businesses in obtaining PPP loans and the steps being taken by the SBA to address these challenges. Mr. Vlahos highlighted the importance of the PPP program in supporting small businesses during the pandemic and the efforts being made to improve the program.

The Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) has also been giving significant attention to small businesses. The department has been working to provide more support to small businesses in areas affected by the pandemic.

In conclusion, the committee emphasized the need for continued support for small businesses to ensure their survival and recovery. It also called for continued improvements in the PPP program to make it more accessible and beneficial to small businesses.

In the ongoing pandemic, workers such as taxi drivers, Uber and Lyft drivers, Grubhub and Postmate deliverers, Airbnb hosts, and other gig-economy workers have experienced financial strain. The Pandemic Unemployment Assistance (PUA) program was intended to provide relief to self-employed workers and independent contractors, among others, who have been adversely affected by the pandemic. This program was implemented from February 27, 2020, and has been extended until December 39. The funds derived from the PUA program are distributed to those who have been adversely affected by the pandemic, including gig-economy workers, freelancers, and other self-employed individuals. The program aims to support those who have been economically impacted by the pandemic, and it is available to those who have not received any other forms of assistance.

For more information on COVID-19 updates and related news, please visit the Federal Emergency Funds page, which is regularly updated to provide the latest information on assistance programs.

In conclusion, the Sikh Coalition continues to advocate for workers who have been impacted by the pandemic, and we urge all individuals to stay informed and seek assistance as needed.
